Executive Summary

- Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have been extremely important contributors to the Washington region's non-profit community and have helped address many and varied needs throughout the regional community. Over just the past four years, the two entities have made contributions of almost $100 million to 500 non-profit organizations working to meet needs in the metropolitan Washington region. Their contribution has not only been funding dollars, but they have made substantial contributions to the region's nonprofit infrastructure and leveraging with other resources to meet the region's needs. No other corporations gave more in philanthropy in 2010 than the Freddie Mac Foundation or Fannie Mae, even with the reduced amounts post-conservatorship.
- Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have been central to providing financing for home mortgages in the U.S. and to the American dream of home ownership. Unfortunately the housing financial systems crisis of the past few years has resulted in proposals for significant changes to the system that will change the roles of both entities going forward. It would appear from the discussions through fall of 2011 that they will continue to exist and provide resources for home financing for a considerable period of time if not ongoing, but their attention and roles will be focused on that corporate role. In the case of the Freddie Mac Foundation, it was announced by their President and CEO in mid-September that the Foundation has been directed by its regulator to implement a 3-year wind down plan. The President's letter said that they will actively fund non-profit programs at higher spending levels through CY 2014, and in early 2015 would distribute any remaining Foundation assets. There is no announced wind-down of corporate philanthropy by Fannie Mae, but it is reasonable to assume that their support for nonprofits will decline as well.
- The region's nonprofits are generally aware of the situation with Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and some are anticipating and planning for reduction of funding from them, and the funding challenges faced by different nonprofits varies. The size of the nonprofit, the proportion of funding coming from the two entities, the proportion of expenses supported by the funds, and the kind of programs the nonprofit is operating are and will be key factors in the impact.
- The giving by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac over the past four-year period of 2007-2010 declined significantly with the onset of conservatorship in 2008, but is now declining very gradually. Both entities, however, are aligning their contributions with their business – housing. The Freddie Mac Foundation has announced its wind-down schedule and spending focus for the remainder of its

- assets. In the statement from Ralph Boyd, the Foundation will continue to invest in programs focused on vulnerable children and families, and that in spending the assets down have a “goal to help high performing nonprofits leverage our existing resources to sustain essential programs, services, and funding streams well into the future...” Fannie Mae’s spending focus since the initiation of conservatorship has also been focused on housing, and that trend will likely continue and accelerate as its corporate support of non-profits declines.

- While there are no exact comparable models elsewhere as all regions and situations are different, it is useful to draw on the case of the Detroit region, which experienced significant declines in corporate philanthropy this decade. The Washington region could expect some of what Detroit experienced: less funding for programs in areas like the arts with more focus on critical human needs, and a challenge to achieve a level of regional collaboration to set funding priorities to meet regional objectives rather than funder objectives.

- Given the analysis and findings of this research, it is recommended that the 8 Neighbors
 - Communicate with the region’s nonprofits (especially non-housing) to develop new business plans and whatever is needed to be able to continue operations and plan future programs assuming gradually less funding and support from the two entities.
 - Maintain close working relationships with Fannie Mae and the Freddie Mac Foundation in order to inform the region’s non-profits as the changes will continue to occur over the next few years, and in the case of the Freddie Mac Foundation, seek to collaborate with them to help set priorities and explore structural options for extending the life of their assets beyond its announced three-year wind down.
 - Consider using this research and its findings to initiate informed discussions of the region’s leadership directed to finding new corporate funding and to formulating new programs and initiatives to support sustainable, long-term funding of the regional community’s needs.

Purpose of Report

The purpose of this research is to examine the current situation of the philanthropic roles and contributions by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac in the Washington metropolitan area, and how their roles and funding of the region's nonprofit community may change in the near future. The two corporations have been major contributors to and supporters of the community over the years. Potential changes to their functions and structure caused by the housing and financial crisis has already had effects on nonprofit funding levels in the region, and the research is to assess what may happen in the year(s) ahead regarding their support for regional nonprofits.

Fannie Mae-Freddie Mac History

Fannie Mae was founded in 1938 during the Great Depression as part of the New Deal, and was set up as a government-sponsored enterprise (GSE), and in 1968 was converted to a publicly traded company. Its purpose was to provide local banks with federal money to finance home mortgages in order to raise levels of home ownership and increase the availability of affordable housing. Freddie Mac was created in 1970 to expand the secondary market for mortgages and as an additional effort to increase the supply of money available for mortgage lending and therefore money available for home purchases.

Both entities have been very important in increasing the level of home ownership in the U.S. since their inception such that approximately 2/3 of households are homeowners. The two corporations plus the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) together now guarantee approximately ninety percent of new mortgages. Unfortunately, both corporations relaxed underwriting standards to compete with other segments of the private financing market with the run-up of the housing bubble in the mid-2000s. When housing prices started falling in 2006-2008, both corporations began losing money. By August 2008 shares of both corporations had dropped more than ninety percent from their value in 2007. In September of 2008 the corporations were taken over by the U.S. government in order to prevent further financial crisis, and the corporations were placed into conservatorship.

Fannie Mae-Freddie Mac: The Current Situation

Since going into conservatorship, the two entities have continued to carry out their mortgage underwriting role using money from the Federal government, and through the first quarter of 2011 the amount of Federal support is estimated at $135 billion. The outfall of this situation is that proposals have been put forward to change the role of government in the housing market. The Obama administration released a white paper in February of 2011, Reforming America's Housing Finance Market, that outlined three options for changing government's role. All three options would likely affect the future of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac very significantly. House Republicans have put forward responses and other proposals. Given these developments, it is reasonable to assume that both entities may well cease to exist, certainly in their current forms and roles. As of fall 2011, however, it does seem likely given the continuing economic troubles and housing financing issues, that the two corporations will be in existence for a considerable period as the country tries to recover and to resolve the problems of the home finance industry.

The national stage on which all of this gets played out will be of great importance to the Washington region's non-profit community. Fannie and Freddie have been strong supporters and partners with many non-profits in the region in meeting the needs for education, human services, homelessness, health care, housing, community development and others. Given the depth of the crisis and the clear consensus that the two entities' roles will be greatly changed if not eliminated, it is reasonable to assume that over the next few years their contributions to the region's non-profits will recede and cease to exist.

The nature of giving from the two entities, however, is very different in how their local contributions could cease. Funding to regional non-profits from Freddie Mac is primarily from the Freddie Mac Foundation, which has separation from the corporation. The Foundation has significant assets and funding has been generated from the earnings on those assets. Funding declined after conservatorship, and in mid-September the Foundation was directed by its regulator (Federal Housing Finance Agency) to implement a three-year wind down plan beginning in 2012. The Foundation has indicated that its community investing would substantially exceed the CY 2010 levels through 2014, and then distribute any remaining assets in early 2015.

On the other hand, Fannie Mae eliminated its foundation several years ago, and since conservatorship has been providing funding in the form of traditional corporate giving. This giving has become much more aligned (than in pre-conservatorship) with its corporate mission of housing finance, and giving to non-housing needs has diminished significantly. But more importantly for the region's non-profits, what happens to change or eliminate Fannie Mae by the national forces at play would fairly immediately change giving to local non-profits. Also, given the directive from FHFA to the Freddie Mac Foundation, it is reasonable to assume that the regulator will also be directing changes to Fannie Mae's philanthropy spending in the very near future.

The Region's NonProfits in 2011

A sample of non-profit organizations that are recipients of funds from Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were interviewed to assess how they might be impacted by changes in the giving patterns of the two entities. Some of the nonprofits interviewed have already experienced some reductions from one or both, others have continued to receive their historical level of funding but are aware and sensitive to the possibilities of significant changes and reductions. Common themes and significant points from the interviews:

- A common theme was a recognition that the outlook is generally that funding from the two entities will likely lessen significantly if not go away entirely. Some of those responding with this view indicated that they were revising their business plans and otherwise making preparations for dealing with the situation.
- A few had begun identifying potential replacement sources and/or how they would reduce the cost of operations in order to continue their programs without current funding from Fannie or Freddie. One suggestion was that a program is needed in the region to encourage citizens and corporations to take more responsibility for social needs, perhaps some kind of regional awareness effort to encourage more giving period.
- There was a clear worry expressed about some programs – notably those for children, foster care, and families. This sentiment recognized that the situation with both organizations at the national level would likely mean that both organizations would be pressured to allocate available funds to the housing areas and away from anything that was not housing.
- Another worry expressed was that operational capacity would be at risk going forward, especially for those getting a significant portion of their funding from either of the entities. It was noted that some organizations might not appear to be severely threatened as they may only get 5 percent of funding from one of the two, but that 5 percent of total funding might mean 25 percent of non-restrictive funding and such loss would be severe. A suggestion from one interviewee was that an option for some nonprofits would be to consolidate some programs.
- Some wondered if the major funding cuts have already happened, and if there will be fewer/less likely reductions in the future. A majority did not give this view, but is a somewhat troubling sentiment given the potential for significant reductions.

Trends in Giving, 2007 – 2010

The combined contributions of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to the greater Washington community have been substantial and very important to meeting many of the needs of the non-profit services community. For the four-year period of 2007-2010, the two companies contributed $99.3 million to over 500 non-profit organizations in the region. The impact of the two companies going into conservatorship has clearly affected the philanthropic contributions of both organizations. In 2007 the combined contributions of Fannie Mae and the Freddie Mac Foundation were $64.7 million nationally. Contributions declined to $41.3 million in 2008 with the advent of conservatorship and contributions further declined but more modestly the past two years, and 2010 total contributions were $38.3 million, a four-year decline nationally of 40.8 percent.

Data for each year for the period 2007-2010 were analyzed to provide a picture of changes in giving patterns for a year and a half before conservatorship and then two and a half years afterwards.

The drop in contributions was not as severe for the Washington area recipient organizations, as total contributions from both companies was $30.8 million in 2007 and $21.3 million in 2010, a decline of 30.8% compared to the national decline of 40.8 percent. The share that Washington organizations received from the two companies increased from 47.5 percent in 2007 to 55.6 percent in 2010, indicating that a higher priority was placed on the local community as each of the organizations were reducing contributions.

Total Contributions by Freddie Mac Foundation and Fannie Mae, 2007-2010

For contributions to regional organizations, Freddie Mac’s contributions dropped the largest amount from 2007-2008, and then more gradually since 2008 and 2010 contributions were slightly higher than 2009. Contributions in 2010 were 35.3 percent less than in 2007. The increase in Freddie Mac Foundation contributions from 2009-10 reflect better equity market conditions and therefore better earnings for the Foundation’s assets. Overall, Freddie Mac’s contribution patterns have been primarily focused on the Washington region since its inception, and the share of total contributions going to Washington organizations was 89.9 percent in 2007 and increased to 97.6 percent in 2010.

Fannie Mae’s contributions to local organizations did not have a sharp decline over the analysis period, as 2007 contributions were $12.1 million and have declined each succeeding year and in 2010 were $9.2 million. That represents a decline of 24.0 percent, much lower than the decline in contributions to the rest of the U.S. of 47.5 percent, and also a smaller decline in dollar contributions as well as percentage than the Freddie Mac Foundation contribution declines.

2007-2010 Contributions to
Washington Area Organizations

For the year 2010, compared to other corporate philanthropy in the Washington region as compiled and reported by the Washington Business Journal, no other corporations gave more in philanthropy in 2010 than the Freddie Mac Foundation or Fannie Mae, even with its reduced amounts post-conservatorship. Comparing the local giving per local employee for corporations, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac were both in the top ten in corporate philanthropy of the fifty top local corporate givers in 2010.

Trends in Contributions by Type

Contributions to the top 200 recipient organizations were grouped into general categories to further analyze changes in contribution trends of the two organizations. There are no standard definitions of categories, and many non-profit organizations have diverse programs, so the analysis of trends by category recognizes that conclusions are fairly general.

Contributions by the two organizations were grouped into the following categories:

- Arts
- Community Development
- Education
- Homelessness
- Housing
- Human Services
- Miscellaneous (all other)

Given in Table 1 is a summary of contributions by Fannie Mae and the Freddie Mac Foundation for each year 2007-2010, and Figure 3 summarizes contributions (combined) by category for each of the years.

Figure 4
 Aggregate Categories
 Freddie Mac Foundation and Fannie Mae
 Contributions to Washington Area Organizations

Contributions have declined for the arts, community development, education, and human services. They have increased for housing as well as homelessness (which is one area of housing). This is an indication that both organizations are aligning their contributions with their business, which is housing.

Collapsing the seven categories into four shows this conclusion even more clearly in Figure 4 comparing 2007 (pre-conservatorship) with 2010 (post-conservatorship). Comparing 2007 and 2010, the share of contributions in the Housing and Homeless categories from Freddie Mac increased from 15.9% in 2007 to 43.9%, and for Fannie Mae increased from 16.9% to 65.2%. The difference between the two reflects that contributions from Fannie Mae are corporate while those from Freddie Mac are from its foundation, which has the ability to transition more gradually.

Human services and education programs have incurred the most significant declines, and the trends from 2007-2010 plus the likely internal corporate pressure and external political pressures will mean that future giving will continue in this direction; i.e., a greater share of contributions to what is their business – housing related programs – and fewer funds going to all other programs.

Overview of Potential “At Risk” Recipients

To examine if there are organizations that rely heavily on the Freddie Mac Foundation or Fannie Mae of both for their programs, data from each organization’s 990 return was reviewed for the top 100 Washington area recipients for the year 2008 (most recent year with complete data). Two sorts and tabulations were made: one of the share of total contributions were from Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac contributions, and the other of the proportion of total Contributions from Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae was of their 2008 expenses. A summary is shown in Table 2.

Freddie Mac Foundation and Fannie Mae Contributions as Share of Total Contributions		Freddie Mac Foundation and Fannie Mae Contributions as Share of Total Expenses
Contributions as Share of Total Contributions	Number of Recipients	Share of Total Expenses	Number of Recipients
More than 10%	9	More than 10%	5
4.0% to 9.9%	7	4.0% to 9.9%	7
1.0% to 3.9%	13	1.0% to 3.9%	14
Less than 1.0%	71	Less than 1.0%	74

This suggests that there are several organizations that will need to find other funds to replace potentially at-risk Fannie/Freddie funds, but also shows that the region’s organizations are not totally dependent on the FM2 funds for their programs. It certainly means a lot to them, but most of funding is from a diverse portfolio.

The Detroit Experience

Research was conducted to see if there are other models in the U.S that might provide some intelligence about the challenges being faced. While there appeared to be no exact analogies, the experiences of the Detroit region offer some insight to the current situation. We interviewed Doug Rothwell, President and CEO, Business Leaders for Michigan. The organization is statewide, but focused on the greater Detroit area. Rothwell indicated that the Detroit non-profit community faced similar challenges over the past few years with the economic decline that was particularly acute in that region and especially affected their large corporations and philanthropy. He indicated that this happened fairly abruptly and without any strategy or preparation.

Some key quotes:

“Detroit has gone through SUBSTANTIAL downsizing of corporate philanthropy and will never be back where we were a decade ago. I think the same is true nationally. Corporations cut back to a level of giving that can be sustained and will not beg difficult questions from shareholders or regulators... funding for critical human services and, to a lesser degree, education, became the top priorities. Funding for the arts, culture and events took the biggest hits.

General-purpose organizations, like chambers, took bigger hits than special purpose ones that address human services and education needs. We have seen a greater interest in regional collaboration than we have in the past, but I have not seen any coordinated effort by the community writ large or the corporate community in particular to sit at a table and develop a shared set of giving priorities. I don't think it works that way in most places, as each “funder” wants to be able to give in a way that reflects their own priorities and needs. My sense is that the community would be better off trying to identify its priorities for the funders, but I think they'd have the same problem trying to prioritize

When asked about creating efforts or a regional group to meet the challenge of cuts in corporate philanthropy, Rothwell replied, “We “did” have such a group in metro Detroit called OneD. But it fell apart after several years largely because the groups were willing to collaborate, but not cede their ability to unilaterally set priorities...The funders of these organizations want them to “work together” and avoid duplication, but are unwilling to set unified priorities if that means saying one group or issue is more important than another!”

Conclusions

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have been important and major resources for supporting the missions of many nonprofit organizations in the Washington region for many years. The national financial and housing market crisis of the past few years resulted in the two organizations being placed in conservatorship. This led to declines in philanthropic giving since 2007, and while the declines have been more gradual since conservatorship occurred in 2008, it is reasonable to assume given the dynamics of the situation at the national level, that their philanthropic giving will further decline. And in the case of the Freddie Mac Foundation, the wind down plan has been announced and that it will expend all of its assets by early 2015.

The giving patterns of the two organizations have adjusted to place more priority on programs related to housing, and these trends will continue as both organizations' philanthropy diminishes in total. Nonprofits in the region are generally aware of the threat to some of their funding. Some have begun developing alternative plans and others know of the threat but are just beginning to plan for adjustments. In seeking other potential models elsewhere that may provide guidance; there were no exact models. Detroit has experienced declines in general corporate philanthropy, and efforts to prioritize reductions were difficult to organize.

Given the announced wind down plan by the Freddie Mac Foundation directed by its regulator the Federal Home Finance Agency, it is now known that the Foundation's assets will be distributed by early 2015. FHFA's directive to the Foundation likely means that Fannie Mae will also receive directives to curb if not eliminate its non-profit funding as well. Organizations should develop plans for replacing this funding and reducing expenses or combining programs.

The decline and likely end of philanthropic giving by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac – the two largest corporate givers in the region – provide opportunities, and a real need for other corporations in the region to step up and fill the funding gaps that will soon be faced by the region's nonprofit community. While this research has focused on Fannie and Freddie and the nonprofits they support, the real impact will be measured in human costs: fewer homes for foster care kids, fewer beds for the homeless, and the many other bottom-line human needs that are being served.
